DiscoverEd – when and how to use it

When you know of something you want to read, and however you have found out about the existence of something you want to read, if you have tried any full-text buttons or links from the site where you found it, Google Scholar or wherever else: if those don't work, it is always worth, or you should always, check DiscoverEd before giving up.

There are some materials The Library can buy which we may not be able to buy online but which we do have in print. We may have access to something online but not from the place you found out about it. So you would still be able to read it, and still be able to read it online, just not from the place where you first found out about it.

Also, some journals are bought, for example, but not from volume one onwards online. So we may have some journals which we have in print for some earlier issues but we have online for later issues.

The other thing to notes is that even if a book is available to an individual to buy as an online book in some way or a book in electronic format, this does not always mean that institutions like University libraries can buy them in that format. It depends what the publisher makes available.

But, certainly, to see if you can read something you know you want to read and whether you can do that from The Library, go to DiscoverEd. The simple search, or the search box you are presented with, have a look at the options which are there, so check the limiting or the filtering buttons underneath the search box and see if that helps you narrow down how you are going to do your search.

If it is journal article you want, then the check you are best advised to make is to see whether we have the journal title or not and so to search on the journal title.

Look at DiscoverEd. See how you can best use it for what it is you are after and even if you have tried other routes, it is always worth looking at DiscoverEd incase we have something in print but not online. Or, we have it online from somewhere but just not where you were expecting or had found out about it first.

https://discovered.ed.ac.uk